Nimer Bin Adwan

The Poet of Love and Loyalty

An unusual example of love and life in the Arabian desert

Nimer grew up in the house of his uncle Barakat. When he reached adolescence, he traveled to Jerusalem to receive his education, then to Al-Azhar. After that he went back to his family in the Adwan tribe, where he became Chief after defeating the tribes of Balqa', and then went on to live a love story with Wadha that was immortalized in modern history. His life is an example of the life of noble knights, those who became immortal through their noble and great feats, which place him among the greatest love stories of poets in history.

Summary

Nimer falls in love with a girl from the Sakhr tribe called Wadha. He marries her and they live a happy life, which made their life back then an unusual example of the relationship between a man and a woman in the Arabian desert. But while he's away in Nablus, Wadha comes down with cholera and dies a few days before his return, he's shocked by her unexpected death. Nimer becomes sick and goes through some very hard times with all the suffering in a tragic hero character, which gives birth to some of the greatest poems that are still remembered by people until this day, and he was immortalized as a knight, a poet, a lover, and an example of loyalty to his beloved, whom he didn't forget despite marrying other women after her.
